Yardwork

A Biography of an Urban Place

Yardwork is Daniel Coleman's attempt to put down roots in a place he never expected to be, a patch of garden on the edge of the Niagara Escarpment, to deeply understand its ecology, landscape and history. Starting with creation myths and geology, moving through the settler era and up to the present, Coleman learns and shares as much of the story of the land as possible. Yardwork meditates on the sedimentary layers of ecological, cultural and political stories that make up Hamilton, the escarpment city at the Head of the Lake. A fascinating book that encourages readers to look beneath the surface of their familiar surroundings.

Daylighting Chedoke

Exploring Hamilton's Hidden Creek

Chedoke Creek is one of six creeks that weave their way through Hamilton, but it is the most hidden, lost to culverts and concrete. Its waters are seen only in a couple of waterfalls as it flows over the edge of the escarpment and in a short canal where it runs alongside Highway 403.

In elegant, seamless prose award-winning author John Terpstra traces Chedoke Creek back to its source, searching through historical archives, and walking up great storm drains that collect the water. He weaves the history of the creek with observations of nature and our connection to nature and the reality of our contaminated waterways. Daylighting Chedoke is a meditation on how urbanization and industrialization have buried our natural environment and what it would be like to free our creeks.
